Description: THIS RESOURCE IS NO LONGER IN SERVICE. Documented on May 15, 2024. Nano Research Facility (NRF) at Washington University in St. Louis is a NNIN nodal facility supported by the National Science Foundation. It cultivates an open, shared research, and education environment that brings researchers across disciplines together, particularly in the emerging area of nanomaterials with applications in the energy, environment, and biomedical fields. The mission is to be a resource to the scientific and technical community for the advancement of nanoscience and nanotechnology in a safe and environmentally benign manner. NRF includes a micro- and nano-fabrication lab (clean room), surface characterization lab, particle technology lab, and imaging lab with a focus on bio-imaging. NRF provides unique technical expertise in: Knowledge-based synthesis of nanostructured materials Particle instrumentation tools for toxicity studies Non-invasive imaging modalities for biological applications Clean Energy Applications Energy and Environmental nanotechnology Environmental Health and Safety As a member of the National Nanotechnology Infrastructure Network (NNIN), supported by the National Science Foundation, NRF is available to both academic and industrial users nation-wide and across the globe.
